ATTESTATION DU MINISTÈRE DES AFFAIRES

INDIENNES ET DU NORD CANADIEN/CANADA

NEW SYMBOL FOR INDIAN ARTS & CRAFTS

Until quite recently the average person who purchased Indian fine craft could often wonder "Is it made by the Indian people?"

The buyer of Indian crafts will no longer have to wonder as to authenticity with the recent introduction of a distinctive new identifiable trademark for Indian fine craft.

The trademark design, the outcome of a nation-wide competition sponsored by the Department of Indian Affairs, is to be affixed to all articles handcrafted by the Indian people as a guarantee of authenticity and quality for the buyer. Similar identification has been used successfully by Eskimo art and craft producers for some time.

A growing market for authentic Indian arts and crafts over the years has made the Indian people increasingly proud of their skill and aware of the need for an identifying trademark to protect their craft. In response to their requests for such a trademark, the Department of Indian Affairs opened the competition to all Canadian Indian students attending teaching institutions or taking courses of study below the university level.

Thirteen winning designs were finally chosen from the 1200 submitted, the winners each receiving $50 and an award certificate for excellence of design. The schools they were attending were given the eight-volume set of Canadiana published by the Canadian Centennial Library.

Two symbols were common to all thirteen designs — a beaver pelt and stretching frame. These symbols were then professionally stylized to produce a distinctive trademark. In one sense, the beaver pelt and stretching frame express the traditional hunting pursuits of the Indian people, and their closeness to the waters and forests of the land. As a symbol of industry, the beaver also represents the modern-day enterprises of the Indians, the black border line indicating their common aim of producing articles of quality and distinction. In still another sense, the broad expanse of the beaver pelt represents a country stretching from sea to sea, with all Indian communities joined together by the border line.

The design will appear on trademark tags which will be distributed through Indian Agency offices and chiefs and councillors to all Indian craft producers. These tags will be affixed to every article hand-crafted by the Indian people.

"Like the Eskimo art trademark which has been in use for some time, the Indian fine craft trademark will guarantee the authenticity and quality of Indian arts and crafts," Indian Affairs Minister Arthur Laing explained. "It will meet a real need on the part of Indian craftsmen for recognition of their skill."
